ideas, especially in the advertisement area. Personally, I really liked the idea of sending out postcards to potential customers. I didn't get as much from the book as I had hoped, but I was able to take away a few things, so it was worth it for me. I will keep the book as reference material. I did find some of the information in the book was either outdated, or not entirely correct. For example, on page 93, he states that if I use "Address Correction Requested" on my postcards, that the post office will update my mailing list for free. I spoke with the post office about it, to a clerk, and to the local Postmaster. I had placed this note on my postcards, and they told me that there was an extra charge for this service. It costs an extra few cents per mail piece. I also looked on the USPS Web site, and there was a table there that also stated there would be a charge for this service. They also stated something about needing a billing account for this service. The book made it sound like I could just throw a postcard stamp on it, and send it off with "Address Correction Requested", and everything would be free of charge.

Great book for small business owners
By J. Latour
Tom Egelhoff's book on "How to Market, Advertise and Promote Your Business or Service in Your Own Backyard" is a great book for small business owners looking for an edge in marketing, advertising, and new ideas and tips. The book is only 272 pages long and has 16 chapters of great information for small business owners. Here is a quick rundown of each chapter. Chapter 1 addresses small town USA marketing and provides advice on how to find the right expertise to get your business going. Chapter 2 is about building your business resume. Chapter 3 addresses your strengths, weaknesses, opportunities, and threats to your business (affectionately known as SWOT). Chapter 4 talks about sales forecasting and myths about selling. Chapter 5 tells you about your customers and how to find more of them for your business - mostly by analyzing your market. Chapter 6 talks about creating an effective marketing plan. Chapter 7 is about how to position your business and it provides great examples of how other companies do it. Chapter 8 is all about creating an advertising plan in your own backyard (city, town, and village). Chapter 9 tells you how to sell your message and a basic summary of your advertising. Chapter 10 gives you an outline and a plan on how to develop your marketing calendar. Chapter 11 tells you how to execute your plan. Chapter 12 asks you if your plan is working. Chapter's 13-16 addresses small town success, advertising, and promotion and how to do it better. Egelhoff provides an additional 115 tips of information for the small business owner in the back of the book. Some of them include the following tips:

1. Know who your customers are
2. Promote with Postcards
3. Create a survey

If you are small business owner, this book is for you. It is even good for the big business reader as well. This is a great book that offers good advice on how to market, advertise and promote your business in your own city, town, or village (reviewed on Inteljim.com)
